

SALARY SACRIFICE FOR DEFINED BENEFIT SCHEME MEMBERS

WHAT IS SALARY SACRIFICE?

Salary sacrifice is when you contribute to your superannuation account from your pre-tax salary. This means that the money is deducted from your salary before any income tax is deducted, thereby reducing the amount of salary that you are paying income tax on, but also potentially reducing the amount that you are paid as your normal 'take home' pay. It is important to note that when you salary sacrifice into super, these contributions are taxed at 15% (except if your income including your pre-tax superannuation contributions is over $250,000, then some or all of your concessional contributions will be taxed at 30%).

When salary is sacrificed into super, the contributions are preserved in the fund and you cannot access them until you satisfy a condition of release. There are certain advantages and disadvantages to salary sacrificing into superannuation. If you think that this is an option that you would like to pursue, we would advise that you consult one of our financial planners to see if this option is right for you.

How can you make salary sacrifice contributions?

Salary sacrifice contributions can only be made on your behalf by your employer as a deduction from your pre-tax salary. You will first need to find out if your employer offers employees the option of making salary sacrifice contributions as this is not a mandatory requirement.

If your employer does offer employees the option of making salary sacrifice payments and you would like to contribute this way, you will need to arrange this with your employer.

What are your contribution options with salary sacrifice?

As a member of the Defined Benefit Scheme, you are required to contribute a part of your salary into your superannuation which is referred to as a 'Defined contribution'. This contribution is used to purchase 'units' on your account.

You also have the option of contributing additional amounts into your Other Contributions Account which are referred to as 'Optional top up contributions'.

With your employer's agreement, you can make either of these contributions as salary sacrifice contributions or as contributions from your post-tax salary. There is also an option to contribute using a mix of salary sacrifice and post-tax amounts.

How much can you salary sacrifice?

Because salary sacrifice contributions come from your pre-tax income, they are classed as concessional contributions and therefore are restricted by the concessional contributions cap. Concessional contributions comprise all taxable contributions paid into your account and including any amounts paid by your employer.

The standard concessional cap is $27,500 per annum and applies to all members. Contributions within the cap are taxed at 15%, except if your annual income including your pre-tax superannuation contributions exceeds $250,000, when some or all of your concessional contributions may be taxed at 30%.

The impact of tax on your contributions

It is important to note that when you pay any defined benefit contributions by salary sacrifice or pre-tax rather than post-tax, this will increase the amount of the contribution required. This is to compensate for the 15% contributions tax that must be paid by the Scheme on these types of contributions. This compensation increase is called 'grossing-up'.

You can calculate the pre-tax 'grossed-up' value by simply multiplying any post-tax figure by 1.17647. For example, if your post-tax contribution amount is normally $100, you would have to pay $117.65 as a pre-tax contribution. This means, when $117.65 is received in the Scheme and the 15% contributions tax is deducted, $100 will be allocated to the Scheme ($$117.65 - 15\% = \100).

What are some implications of salary sacrificing?

Salary sacrifice can be a tax effective way for low and middle income earners to contribute to super. For members who earn over $18,200 (where the income tax rate exceeds 15%), there may be a tax saving by salary sacrificing into your super.

Another thing to consider is the impact this may have on your take home pay. Depending on your pre-tax salary and how much you want to contribute, this may result in a reduction in your post-tax amount.

Salary sacrificing will not have any impact on your Pension Entitlement and contribution amount as these are both based on your gross salary. Before making a decision to salary sacrifice into super, you need to consider how it will affect your current financial situation.
